Ellie and her younger brother are waiting for a bus on a cold, foggy evening.

The Last Bus

Ellie pressed her face against the cold glass of the bus shelter and watched the road disappear into the fog. The timetable, peeling at one corner, promised that the last bus to Hollow Lane would arrive at 6:15. Her watch said 6:24.

"It's not coming," said her brother, Sam, kicking at a puddle. He was seven, and he had already decided that this was the worst day of his life.

Ellie did not answer. She was thinking about the long walk home: past the farm with the barking dogs, over the narrow bridge and up the hill where the streetlights stopped. In daylight it took forty minutes. In the dark, with Sam complaining at every step, it would feel like forty years.

Then, somewhere in the fog, two yellow eyes appeared. They grew larger and brighter, and a low rumble filled the street. Sam grabbed her sleeve.

"It's only the bus," Ellie said, although for a moment her own heart had jumped.

The doors hissed open. The driver, a large man with a grey beard, looked down at them and smiled. "Sorry I'm late," he said. "Fog's as thick as porridge on the top road. You two had better hop on before you turn into icicles."

Sam was asleep before they reached the bridge.
