In this story, a brother and sister, Priya and Sam, are spending a rainy afternoon in their town library.

The Lost Map

The library was nearly empty on Saturday afternoon. Rain drummed against the tall windows, and the only sound inside was the slow tick of the clock above the desk.

Priya pulled a fat, dusty book about sailing ships from the bottom shelf. As she opened it, a folded piece of paper slid out and fluttered to the carpet like a falling leaf.

"What's that?" whispered her brother, Sam, who was supposed to be choosing a book of his own.

Priya unfolded the paper carefully. Its edges were soft and brown, and it crackled as she smoothed it flat. Someone had drawn a map in faded blue ink. There was the river, the old stone bridge and the church with its pointed spire. In the corner of the park, beside a tree drawn with long, drooping branches, was a small black cross.

"It's our town," said Sam, his eyes wide. "But look how few houses there are. This must be ancient."

Underneath the cross, in tiny, careful handwriting, were the words: Under the willow. For whoever finds it next.

"Treasure," breathed Sam.

Priya was not so sure. She turned the map over. On the back was a name, Edith Hale, and a date: 1952.

Mrs Okafor, the librarian, peered at it over her glasses. "Edith Hale," she said slowly. "She was the librarian here when I was a girl. She used to say that every book was a door."

The next morning, the rain had stopped. The willow was still there, older and wider than on the map, its branches sweeping the wet grass. Sam dug with a garden trowel while Priya held the map.

After a few minutes, the trowel struck something hard. It was a small tin box, rusted at the corners. Inside, wrapped in waxed paper, was a battered notebook full of stories, and a note: Read them, then add one of your own.

Sam looked disappointed for a moment. Then he turned the first page, and he did not look up again for a long time.
